Coobowie -December 1st 2006 until December 4th 2006.

Caravan Park located at the bottom of Yorke Peninsula South Australia.

Fri 1st December 2006: With Sally not due back at work until Tuesday and as I had finished for the week at 6:00am and not due back until 3:00pm on the Monday, we were heading for Coobowie where we have not been since 2001. It really is amazing how time seems to pass us by without realizing where it all has gone. As we were driving towards Port Wakfield, we were watching the thunder storms with lightening pass across in front of us. The closer we got to Coobowie, the stronger the wind became which at times would be the norm for that part of the peninsula. After nearly 2 1/2 hours on the road we were soon on our site at the Coobowie Caravan Park.

Sat 2nd December 2006: With a light wind continuing to blow, we decided to go for a drive along the Edithburgh tourist drive which took us out past the Wattle Point wind farm which is the largest wind farm in Australia today with 55 turbines generating enough electricity to power 52,000 homes.

From all parts of the tourist drive, we could look back and see the turbines of the wind farm slowly turning at an ever slow pace. The road was gravel which took us along part of the southern coast line of Yorke Peninsula for a very short distance. From here we ventured out to Port Giles and Wool Bay. The amount of grain that this part of the State can grow is illustrated by the huge grain silo complex at Port Giles.

There is a good chance of catching some fish from a good selection of jetties which are all within close proximity of each other.

Sun 3rd December 2006: Today was a perfect day with a clear sky and no wind. With the intension of checking out the western side of the peninsular for beach front free camping locations, we headed to the Corny Point lighthouse. The only possible suitable areas for free camping that we found was between Point Soultar and Point Turton. Once back at Coobowie, the remainder of the day was spent with our two dogs on the beach where they enjoyed the freedom to run as they wanted to.
